Field of the Invention This invention relates to analog and digital signal processing, and more particularly, to processing of signals having a time varying parameter. 2. Description of Related Art Modern telecommunications services provide users with increased flexibility with regard to time, place, and rate of telephone calls. For example, conventional telephone systems typically provide voice mail services to both residential and business users which enable users to record, store, and retrieve messages for incoming and outgoing calls. Such messages are stored on a call-by-call basis when the call is either received or received after a predetermined period of time. However, in the case of call return messages, i.e., messages for incoming calls, these messages are not stored and returned to the caller, but rather, the called party receives the voice mail message. Also, rather than being able to selectively choose the times when a particular telephone line is answered, the caller is subject to the telephone answering system's answer message regardless of the caller's availability. Voice mail services have become so useful that users are now able to receive voice mail messages over the Internet. One such example of Internet based voice mail systems is the Global Speech-to-Text Service provided by AT&T and Lucent Technologies of Murray Hill, N.J., USA. With this system, all users who are logged on and using the Internet are able to send and receive text messages via their home or office telephone lines without having to access any voice mail services. Similarly, when a user's home or office telephone line is not connected to the Internet, the user has no way of receiving mail via an internet voice mail system. Thus, such Internet based
